

ABSTRACT

Upon a request from a travel agency, individual transactions (e.g. airline flights and fares) may be provided to a database at the travel agency through the internet from legacy and non-legacy airlines. Legacy airlines may be those within a global distribution system maintained by several of the leading airlines and non-legacy airlines may be those not within the global distribution system. A display screen at the travel agency's processing station displays the legacy transactions and the non-legacy transactions. The database selects one of the transactions and provides for the printing of a ticket for the selected transaction at a printer at the travel agency and for an accounting at the travel agency.
